

An infertile journey begins

by Tina Smith

You could be a newlywed approaching your first anniversary. Maybe you've been happily married for a decade. Either way, you want to be pregnant and you're not.

Infertility doesn't discriminate. Women of varying ages and races with assorted medical histories have faced the harsh reality of not being able to conceive or carry a baby to term.

But not you. Surely not you. You have an ultra-healthy lifestyle. You took the smart route, finished school and paid off debts before starting a family. You met the man of your dreams a little later in life. You never did anything to prevent getting pregnant but just went on living as the years clicked by. You can't wrap your mind around the idea that your path to parenthood won't be as easy as it seems to be for women around you. You refuse to let go of how you always imagined getting pregnant would be – spontaneous, surprising, special.

What do you do? Where do you go? How do you begin a journey that you don't want to take?

You work up the nerve to make an appointment with a reproductive endocrinologist. You catch a glimpse at what infertility is all about. Causes are addressed, resources are uncovered, and a relationship begins between you and your fertility doctor. He talks about risks and success rates, answers your questions and recommends a plan for you that puts all of the medical and financial aspects into perspective. You are treated with respect and kindness by an entire team of support professionals who seem to genuinely care about you. You are no longer alone.

The Fertility Center will focus on your specific needs and create a personalized and confidential treatment approach just for you. With highly trained staff using progressive technology, the Center has one of the highest success rates in the country. You can have hope that your dream of becoming a parent will come true.

Take that first step and call today.
